A Beginner's Guide to Mindful Meditation: Five Tips for Starting a Meditation Practice

What is meditation? Tracing the roots from age-old tradition

By dictionary definition, meditation means to reflect, ponder, or contemplate. But these actions can look different from person to person, and as such, meditation is much more.

Today's modern iteration of mindfulness meditation is derived from a tradition first depicted in ancient Indian wall art dating back to 5,000 BC. When meditation got its start, Indian sage Patanjali referred to it as a transformative experience of fundamental unity, advaita, designed to help humans find the interconnectedness of all living things.

The practice of meditation was then adapted as a staple in other cultures, eventually finding its way to Buddhist teachings. Buddhists emphasized the mindful and personal aspects of meditation, focusing on the practice's ability to affect two major qualities of the mind: vipassana ("insight"), a clear awareness of exactly what is happening as it happens, and samatha ("mind calming"), a state of calm and tranquility that can be experienced throughout the body.

Modern Buddhist practitioner Jack Kornfield is one of the key teachers who integrated these original teachings of vipassana and samatha, developing mindfulness meditation, which is practiced widely today. Mindfulness meditation is the practice of acknowledging the conflicting thoughts in your brain and then choosing where you'd like to focus your thoughts. You can learn to observe the thoughts as they appear and take note of any patterns or sensations that come up in the body.

TRAIN YOUR CONFIDENCE LIKE A MUSCLE FOR 2024

When you start training for a marathon, (most of us) can't run 26.2 miles on Day 1. You have to train consistently over the course of weeks or months to build endurance.

Same goes with confidence! If we fuel our bodies with the proper foods it needs—while avoiding the foods that make us feel sick or sluggish—over time we start to feel great.

- When you feel great, the more energy you have.
- The more energy you have, the more you can accomplish.
- The more you can accomplish, the more confident you feel.

Start training your confidence NOW with perfectly-portioned, nourishing FitMeals delivered right to your doorstep and go into the New Year feeling like the best version of yourself.
